I would like to be a Friend of Trinity

The children that Trinity help come from all manner of backgrounds, and have many different problems. Some are, or have been, in care, or are the victims of abuse. Others may be blind, partially sighted or deaf. Some have learning or emotional difficulties, or behavioural problems. Many are from areas of social deprivation, both urban and rural. They may be excluded from school, at risk of offending, or on rehabilitation from alcohol or drug abuse.

They are generally low achievers, at risk of failing to make an effective transition to adult life, and the great majority share a lack of confidence and low self esteem.

Trinity's aim is to change that by letting them find out what they themselves are capable of achieving, working as part of a team in a challenging environment. Those who take part emerge with new and positive feelings about themselves and others, and a belief that the pattern of their lives can be changed.

Sail training is a tool, a catalyst and a means of motivating young people, changing attitudes and expectations, and encouraging them to take steps that will change the course of their lives for the better. It is not an end in itself, nor a one-off experience.

Our work is carried out in conjunction with many organisations involved in the welfare of young people: schools and colleges, youth groups, social services, local authorities and other statutory bodies. They are able to capitalise on the change in attitude that Trinity brings about, ensuring that long term benefits result.

Part of Trinity's approach to sail training is to include in the experience adults who will be working with the young people in the long term. Sharing it helps bring strong relationships that can be used in making later progress.

The number of young people helped has grown steadily since Trinity was established, and now averages more than 500 each year. They learn much about handling traditional vessels during their time with us, but they learn far more about themselves, and about how to live and work with others.
